In Britain this shift in the emphasis of amphora-borne supplies is apparent from the small but growing numbers of eastern Mediterranean amphorae found in late Roman and post-Roman contexts. These amphorae are relatively common throughout the Mediterranean area from the late fourth/early fifth century AD, and are found in large numbers at many sites. Late Roman amphora production in the Aegean islands of Kos and Paros: recent archaeological and archaeometrical data. The aim of this communication is to present new archaeological evidence supported by archaeometrical examination, concerning the production mechanisms, the morphological typology, the petrography and the chemical analysis of the Late Roman Amphora Production on the Aegean Sea Islands of Kos and Paros. Amphora studies in Cyprus have progressed significantly in recent years, thus providing tangible evidence for the central role the island played in the maritime exchanges occurring in the Mediterranean throughout the Roman period.
